PLAYING THE GAME

Two families compete against each other to answer questions. They try to give answers that match the answers given most often in a survey of 100 people. The first answer listed on the game board is the one given most frequently, followed by the second most frequent answer, and so on.

The game begins by presenting a question. The family who responds first wins the opportunity to answer first (“wins the face-off”). If the response of the first family is not the one given most frequently, the opposing family gets an opportunity to answer the same question. The family with the highest match has the choice of going first or passing to the opposing family.

The computer will then give each family member 30 seconds to match their answer with the remaining answers on the board. If they are able to match all the answers, they win the points accumulated for each match. However, if the family fails three times to make a match (three strikes), the opposing family has one chance to “steal” the question by matching one of the remaining answers on the question board. If they succeed, they win the total points shown. If they fail, the points will be awarded to the first family.

FAST-MONEY ROUND

This is a bonus round for the family with the most points. The computer selects two family members for the Fast-Money round and gives each of them the same five questions. To earn points, their answers must match responses given by 100 people in the survey. Don't peek at each other's answers! You have 15 seconds to respond to each question. After the first player has given all five answers, the program shows the frequency with which the people surveyed answered each question. The program then poses the same five questions to the second family member.

If the combined total score of the Fast-Money round is 200 or more, an additional 10,000 points is awarded.

The top ten winners are shown on the Champions List.
